During the celebration on Friday in the city Salvador, the famous Baiana System band shouted with thousands of people "Fora Temer," meaning "Out with Temer," and "Couperpetrators shall not pass!"

The lead singer of the band, Russo Passapusso, brought the political debate to one of the world's most famous parties. He shouted along with thousands of Brazilians, "Sexist, fascist, they shall not pass!"

Musician Caetano Veloso, known for his work in the "Tropicalismo" musical movement and as a political activist, also showed his discontent with the current government, shouting "Fora Temer" to a cheering crowd during his unexpected performance in Salvador.

"Salvador, Bahia: It's Carnival, but all of them have not forgotten about the coup in Brazil."

Demonstrators also called for the country's constitutional president, Dilma Rousseff, to be reinstated in power with signs saying "Volta Dilma," meaning "Dilma Return." Rousseff, who won reelection for a second term in 2014 with more than 54 million votes, was removed from office last August in an impeachment process widely condemned nationally and internationally as a parliamentary coup, but she was not stripped of her political rights, allowing her to run for office again in the future.

Also in Salvador, hundreds gathered to show support for former President Luiz Inacio "Lula" da Silva, shouting "Ole, ole, ole, ole, Lula, Lula!" Polls indicate that Lula, Rousseff's predecessor, is Brazil's favored candidate for the 2018 presidential election.

Michel Temer, on the other hand, who was Rousseff's running mate for the 2014 presidential election and played a role in orchestrating the parliamentary coup that removed her from office, is barred from running for office for the next two presidential terms for violating electoral finance rules — a fact that did not stop him from being installed as president.

Temer has introduced a series of sweeping privatization proposals and cuts to education, health and other social sectors since he was sworn in last August. The unelected president, who has very low approval ratings in Brazil, is set to complete Rousseff's presidential term until the next scheduled election in late 2018.
